

Abstract

Ethical reductionism is the view that moral properties are identical to properties of the sciences. I defend reductionism against a naturalistic nonreductionist view that parallels Fodor's view of special science properties. First I show that reductionism can accommodate the multiple realizability of moral properties. Then I argue that nonreductionism fails to include moral properties in good explanations, while reductionism succeeds in doing so.